despite our best effort to minimize, and reduce consumption our household electricity costs did increase more than 10% with the implementation of the two tier rates. When there are many occupants in a home, the electricity consumption will increase. That means homes with multiple residents will pay more on the High second tier relative to a similar house that has a single occupant. It seems that the government which initiated this transition to the two tier likely missed some obvious unfairness. I have previously expressed my comments, and now am following your requirement to comment using your form. I have serious doubt that it will matter.
