I know the commissioners are well on their way to writing their report, but the world keeps moving forward regardless of various set timelines.

This article shows how British Petroleum is moving rapidly into the electric car charging business, just a Shell has already done in the UK and elsewhere.

You may recall that in my oral submission, I observed that it would be oxymoronic for BC Hydro not to be involved in the establishment of electric vehicle charging stations saying something like that would be like oil companies not being involved in the selling of gas and diesel fuels at the retail level.

Well here is some evidence that the oil companies are now also getting into the selling of electricity to recharge electric cars.

Hope the commissioners/ panel members will find this of interest.

Sincerely

Don Scott
